Guard at Thiaucourt Had Peculiar Notion of Yank Souvenirs

SEICHEPREY MEN PASS BY

American Prisoners Are Herded in Church and Started Towards Germany by Night

One serious sharge has repeatedly been brought against the Germans which even their einborate and far-reaching propaganda service has never attempted to disprove. It has been said that the German has no sense of humor. The answer is that he hasn't. The proof there of is this:

When, late last winter, the first American prisoners were taken through the town of 'Thiaucourt, liberated last month in the smashing in of the St. Mihlei salient, there was a great to-do among the Germans stationed there. The news of the captives' approach ran ahcad of them, and when the little group—six Yanks and two pollus, all the fruit of a raiding party or the result of a strayed patrol—filed into town, French citizens and German soldiers looked on with interest and, so far as the Germans were concerned, with jubilation. There was shouting and laughter and song. The procession itself, however, wasn't the joke—meaning the joke the Germans didn't get. Those first prisoners, unlike the brothers who were to follow them after Selcheprey, still carried most of Equipment C on their persons or their backs. Only one article of apparel, as it has often humorously called, the onlookers had to turn their glances to the heads of the Boche guard.

And This Is the Joke

The Boche guard, to a man, were topped off with what used to be called the Old Overseas Cap. It was their idea of a souvenir.

topped off with what used to be called the Old Overseas Cap. It was their idea of a souvenir.

If you do not think it is so, you may sak Madame Pette, who, with her 12 year old son, lived in the house next to the church at Thiaucourt all the while that the Boche was an unwolcome tenant of the town, and who left the shell-scarred place—more shell scarred now than ever before—when the Americans entered it and enabled her to write in her almanach in great red letters, after the printed date, September 12, the one word, "Deliverance."

An odd record, that almanach. As a piece of printing one might find far worse, but its name was against it. It was called the Almanach des Ardennes, it was issued to subscribers—if people to whom a newspaper is distributed gratis can be called subscribers—of the Gazette des Ardennes, the most infamous publication ever printed. Ever since the hand of the Hun was laid upon Belgium and northern France, the Gazette des Ardennes, published in French, but otherwise utterly German, has been scattering its lies far and wide.

The people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes, nead the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots clsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt, like their compatriots elsewhere in the invaded 'egions, read the Gazette des Ardennes people of Thiaucourt.

The Almanach des Ardennes allowed a page a month, a line a day, in true almanach style, for any entries which the possessor might care to make. The entries, therefore, had to be short. That is why, opposite April 20, Madame Pette had room to write only: "American prisoners in church." They were the men taken at Scicheprey.

The people of Thiaucourt knew days before that the Seicheprey attack was to take place, and they burned to tell of it. It was the talk of the town's German boarders, who seemed to expect great things of it. After it was over they did not seem highly pleased with everything that had happened there; the impression held in French Thiaucourt was that something must have gone awry.

But the Huns had their prisoners, anyway. They led them into the town, most of them robbed of their shoes, a band numbering between 150 and 200. They herded them all in the little church next to Madame Pette's home. In front of Madame Pette's home was the village pump, and thinter the Yanks were led, in small, closely guarded, convoys, to drink or to wash. Some of them, daring the anger of their guards, gave bon jour to the sliently sympathetic French, who durst not come too near.

That night there was a commotion outside the church. The captured Ameridurst not come too near.

That night there was a commotion outside the church. The captured Americans were being led forth to the station. How did they leave Thiaucourt, in what kind of cars, under how strong a guard? Madame Potte cannot tell you, because no one was allowed in the neighborhood of the gare when such an exodus as this was being accomplished.

Hun Justice

Hun Justice

One day a German and a French plane met in battle high above Thiaucourt. The German fell, a precipitate streak of fame, and after him, like a broken winged bird, fluttered his conqueror's machine. It landed tolerably gently in a field, and the pilot hopped nimbly out. Women working in the field saw then that he was aff American. Down the road that led between the fields he ran, making for a wood not far away. He said something to the Frenchwomen as he passed, perhaps asking his direction, perhaps merely passing the sime of day. They spoke in return, scarcely enough to be considered guilty of giving aid and comfort to the enemy. But every woman who uttered so much as a word to the scelng airman was given eight days in prison by her German overlords. Not long after the airman was led in triumph through the streets of Thiaucourt. That night he, too, disappeared Germany-ward from the little gare.

LIKE YOUR PICTURE?

Any one—a general, a cook or a second lieutenant, or any one like that—who happens to stray within the focus of an Army camera when it is working can, if he wants, buy as many prints of the resulting picture as he may desire for private circulation.

The method is fairly simple. First, ask the photographer for his name and for the film pack or plate number of the picture. Then send that name and number to the Signal Corps Photographic Laboratory, A. P. O. 702, A.E.F., and ask for the corresponding file number to the folks back home and with that number they can order as many prints as they desire by sending ten cents for each print to the Bureau of Public Information, 10 Jackson Place, Washington, D.C.

pine wood several kilometers from the market place is a replacement battalion of Americans.

Before the Americans came, there was only fish to sell, but they didn't want fish—is not salmon occasionally included in Army rations? Ice, just a little of it to cool water, was the chief demand at the start. And so a great ice chest was installed in the market place to care for future possibilities.

Out in the lone pine wood the men were planning. This battalion training cadre had been in France many months, and had been doing its best on a more or less daily diet of canned willy.

The plans it was laying were for nothing less than a banquet. But no banquet is complete without ice cream. And the only chance for ice cream depended upon the wrinkled godmother in the fish stall.

At the suggestion her face crinkled with smiles. She would do her best, she said in French which any Amercian could understand.

Banquot day came. One kitchen-billet was lined with press, another with cake; still another had field ovens piping hot for juicy beef, and one more housed men concocting fresh vegetables into salads. And a squad was already on the long blike for ice.
